CHEYENNE.

CHEYENNE is the capital of Wyoming, the county seat of Laramie County, and the commercial center of an immense stock-raising, mining and agricultural territory, made up of parts of Wyoming, Colorado and Nebraska.

The first house in Cheyenne was built in July, 1867, since which time the growth of the city has been continuous and healthy; the population at the present time is 13,000; the city has street railways, gas and electric light, complete sewerage and water systems, free mail delivery, free State and county libraries, public parks, a fine opera house and all of the conveniences of a modern city.

As a railroad center Cheyenne has superior advantages. It is located in the center of the great Union Pacific system, being midway on the main line between Ogden and Omaha, the terminal points of the line. Cheyenne is further the intersecting points of the north and west lines extending from Central Wyoming to Fort Worth, Texas. The Union Pacific Company has located its main shops at Cheyenne and has to the present time expended several millions of dollars in the erection. The shops employ upward of 1,000 men and, when completed, will have a complement of 2,000 men.

Cheyenne is the western terminus of the Burlington Railway system in Wyoming. This company runs trains direct from Cheyenne to Chicago, and has heavy investments in the city.

The climate of Cheyenne is delightful; the altitude of 6,045 feet insures a dry exhilerating atmosphere at all seasons of the year. To those afflicted with lung troubles Cheyenne offers inducements hard to duplicate.

Conservative estimates of Cheyenne's future growth are that the city will double its population within five years.
